Negative Pressure Wound Therapy

- Developed in 1997
- Mechanisms
 - Thermoregulation and moisture retention
 - Drainage of exudate and inflammatory mediators
 - Optimization of the wound bed
 - Microdeformation
 - Macrodeformation

Limitations of

Polyurethane Sponge

- Dressing changes every 2-3 days
- Occasionally painful for the patient
- Macrodeformation causes wound contraction

Goals for the Ideal Sponge

- Bioabsorbable to prevent dressing changes
- Provides a scaffold to fill the defect
- Minimize wound contraction
- Accelerate granulation tissue formation

Our Sponges

- Bioresorbable, biointegratable, and biocompatible sponge
 - Polycaprolactone (PCL)
 - A biodegradable polyester
 - Used in Monocryl™ suture (Ethicon)
 - 2 different manufacturing processes
 - Synthesized from a 25%/75% PCL/chloroform solution
 - 3D printed scaffold
 - PCL is inherently hydrophobic
 - Treated with different agents to make the sponge hydrophilic
 - Sodium hydroxide
 - Polydopamine
 - Polydextrose

Conclusions

- A bioresorbable, biointegratable, and biocompatible sponges
 - Potentially obviate the need for dressing changes by providing a scaffold for cellular ingrowth
 - Minimize wound contraction

Future direction

- Expand the study to assess the PCL sponges treated with NaOH and polydopamine
- Pathology assessment with immunohistochemical staining
- Larger wounds
